Specifically, the complaint claims that AA Automotive allegedly did not have in place a timekeeping system that could accurately record and pay their employees for the actual amount of time these employees worked, including overtime.

The pending class action lawsuit against AA Automotive claims that the company's actions amounted to a violation of the California Labor Code. California Labor Code Section 558 mandates employers who violate the regulation of hours and days worked by an employee shall be subject to a civil penalty.

The complaint also alleges that AA Automotive did not have in place policies and procedures to consistently provide their employees with meal breaks. California labor laws provide that any employee scheduled to work more than five (5) hours shall receive, at a minimum, a thirty (30) minute uninterrupted off duty meal break. Allegedly, even though these employees forfeited meal breaks, they received no additional compensation.
