It can seem obvious that major traffic charges, such as those that require the assistance of a criminal defense attorney in Los Angeles, can negatively affect insurance rates. While this is certainly true, even lesser violations can cause rates to skyrocket. According to information provided from insurancequotes.com, California has one of the highest insurance rate leaps in the country, with premiums rising "to 189% after getting moving violation traffic tickets."

There are several ways to reduce the risk of high insurance rates after traffic infractions for all drivers. For example, a driver may attend classes offered by the DMV. Getting an attorney, even a warrants lawyer, may also help to reduce the potential hike in costs.

Drivers are encouraged to seek legal counsel before just paying fines and admitting guilt. For example, a misdemeanor defense attorney may be able to have charges or penalties reduced in many cases. When the charge does not go on the DMV or criminal record, or if the driver is not found guilty, the charge does not count against insurance.
