Truck driving school is a great way for displace U.S. auto workers to move into a second career. Truck driving training offers workers the chance to obtain CDL training and CDL licensing. Truck drivers can work anywhere in the U.S. and are well paid.

Orange Park, FL (PRWEB) January 7, 2009 -- Truck driving school is a great way for laid off U.S. auto workers to start a second career. Truck drivers can work anywhere in the country and make great money.

The National Truck Drivers School offers a nationally accredited training program that can have drivers licensed and interviewing for jobs in as little as three or four weeks. Students who complete the truck driving training will also receive the commercial driver's license training CDL Training necessary for CDL licensing. Drivers of all trucks with gross-weight ratings of more than 26,000 pounds and drivers of vehicles carrying any quantity of hazardous materials that are required to display warning signs must obtain CDL licensing by passing rigorous tests of their knowledge of safety regulations and their ability to drive the large trucks.

National's truck driving school offers a two phase truck driving training. The first phase is the home study phase, where students attend truck school at their own pace. The second phase is resident training phase, where students complete hands-on truck driving training.

The National Truck Drivers School offers financial assistance to those who qualify. Auto workers can receive Government Financing For Truck School.
