Drivers can prevent their premium rates to increase following an at-fault accident by purchasing accident forgiveness.

Accident forgiveness is an optional coverage that will help drivers to keep their car insurance rates low if they caused an accident. Not every car insurance company offers this coverage, so it's important for drivers to check if their insurer offers this option.

Depending on the severity of the accident and their driving record, causing an accident can make policyholder's premium rates go up by as much as 50%. In order to avoid this thing to happen, some insurance companies offer the accident forgiveness option. Usually, this coverage will make sure policyholder's premium rates stay the same after their first at-fault accident.

Accident forgiveness programs vary a lot from one insurance company to another. Also, accident forgiveness is not offered in every state. Some companies will offer accident forgiveness automatically when policyholders renew their auto policy, while others will offer accident forgiveness as an option for drivers to purchase. There are several insurance companies that will offer accident forgiveness for free for those loyal customers that maintained a cleaned driving record for several years.

Depending on the insurer, the accident forgiveness policy will forgive the policyholder for a single at-fault accident that happened once in a period that ranges from one year to three years, or for multiple at-fault accidents that happened in the same period. Also, if it happens that the policyholder gets involved in an accident while he is covered by accident forgiveness, and he does not follow up that that accident with other accidents, the policyholder premium rates can drop by as much as $100 every year if he maintains a clean driving record.
